One year later: Katrina revisited

Twelve months after Hurricane Katrina, La. farmers press on

The farmers and cattlemen featured in this issue were part of the Market Bulletin's coverage of the aftermath of hurricanes Katrina and Rita last fall. We hope you find their stories of rebuilding and moving on as informative as we did. Next issue we will include more follow ups to last year's storm stories.

All stories by Sam Irwin

Louisiana Christmas tree farmer Clarke Gernon is an optimist. "I tend to be a glass half-full kind of guy," the Pearl River tree grower said. But Gernon insists he can't predict the future of Shady Pond Tree Farm in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

"The Shady Pond is less shady now," Gernon joked. "We lost all of our big poplars. We're un-poplared."

Katrina blew over Southeast Louisiana last Aug. 29 and hit the Pearl River community and St. Tammany Parish hard.

In addition to the uprooted poplars, Shady Pond also lost more than 250 old pecans, water oaks and other hardwoods to the storm.

Fallen shade trees didn't bother Gernon nearly as much as losing all of his 25-foot large Leyland cypress Christmas trees to the winds. At a value of nearly $600 a piece, Gernon could do nothing but burn the blowovers in a $20,000 bonfire.

Gernon also estimated he had to fork over an additional $20,000 in a two-month cleanup to get the Shady Pond ready for the busy cut-your-own-tree selling season. He collected enough debris on his farm to fuel 16 large burn piles. Of the 16, one remaining clump of gnarled, leafless, broken tree branches sits adjacent to his "A" field, waiting to be set afire.

Ever the marketer, Gernon is considering igniting his last hurricane debris pyre on Aug. 29 and inviting the press.

"When I burned all of the big Leylands, I had a media event," Gernon said. "It was raining that day and the Times Picayune put the bonfire on their front page. It was quite dramatic."

Tied in with the tree loss and cleanup costs was the uncertainty of the 2005

Cattlemen deal with levee damage in Plaquemines

Thousands of cows drowned after Hurricane Katrina flooded grazing pastures in Plaquemines Parish. This photo taken last year captures a common sight in the marshy parish.

Cattle ranching in post-Hurricane Katrina Plaquemines Parish may never be the same.

Exposed and vulnerable, herds of cattle were swept into the sea by Katrina's powerful storm surge. Although hay and water drops were arranged by the Louisiana Department of Agriculture and Forestry, USDA and Louisiana Cattlemen's Association, other cattle expired from lack of food and water after being trapped on high land for days after the storm ripped through the weakened ecosystem.

Plaquemines cattlemen know the score. They know it's always a risk to let their animals forage in the harsh conditions of the Mississippi River delta.

The marsh, the remoteness, a salt-water environment, the heat — all of these elements conspire against the delta cattlemen.

Boothville resident Earl Armstrong lost most of his hardy herd of 2,000-plus to Hurricane Katrina. His house was also destroyed.

No stranger to the adverse conditions of lower Plaquemines Parish, the 62-year-old Armstrong has been raising cattle in the river marsh since he was "big enough to carry a bale of hay."

"After the storm passed, we went down to the mouth of the river and I had about a hundred left," Armstrong said. "We even found cattle way back in the marsh three weeks after the storm."

At his Point Celeste pastures, a location 40 miles north of Boothville, Armstrong recovered an additional 200 head.

Christmas tree selling season. Numerous questions abounded. Should Gernon send out his mailing list to New Orleans zip codes? Could he find the labor to help him run the farm during Christmas? Would the public even feel like celebrating Christmas?

Ultimately, Shady Pond Tree Farm posted a 2 percent increase in sales during the 2005 period, but there are still plenty of issues for 2006.

"I have a mailing list of more than 4,000," Gernon said. "I don't think I'll mail to New Orleans this year for practical reasons. It takes a lot of money to do the mail-out."

"I think I'll remove the New Orleans zip codes and add them back in as people sign the guest sheet."

And Gernon is not sure the unprecedented support Shady Pond received last year from western St. Tammany is here to stay.

"Covington support was larger than normal. Was it sentimental? It's hard to read," Gernon said. "I'm sure part of it was sentimental and part of it was because they didn't sustain the devastation the east sustained. The eastern side was so totally devastated beyond description."

One element that worked well for Gernon is that he had not planned on planting any new trees for 2006.

"I was out of space to plant just because of the normal growing cycle," Gernon said. "But I was thankful I decided not to plant. I could not have gotten the land ready even with teams of people."

"There was too much debris in the fields. I don't know if I will plant next year and that will be because of Katrina."

Something else lurks in the back of Gernon's mind as he considers the future of Shady Pond Tree Farm: the shifting demographics of St. Tammany Parish.

"When you come down U.S. 11 and make the turn onto La. 41, you see real estate sign after real estate sign," Gernon said. "Because of the storm we've gotten a large influx of people from south of here that were just devastated. Many of them are not moving back to where they were."

"Reports I'm getting is anything south of I-12 is anathema. They don't want it. North of I-12 is big time. Things are popping."

It's true. Save Time Pantry, a 1960s-era concrete block convenience store on U.S. 11 that was shuttered by Katrina, is being replaced with a new and modern metal building. And although broken magnolias and pines still litter vacant lots, two new supermarkets and a carwash/barbecue stand on La. 41 are going up. On the Pine Street Extension, the entrance road to Shady Pond, woodlands are being cleared for new residential subdivisions.

"Development is a double edged sword," Gernon said. "I heard a 20-acre tract of land north of I-12 has an offer on it for $1.2 million."

"The sad part is it's all happening too quickly. There's no plan. It's a continuation of what happened immediately after the storm where large numbers of people saw opportunities to get rich."

Most Christmas tree farmers understand their market and can generally predict how many trees they will sell in a season. But with the post-Katrina growth in St. Tammany Parish, Gernon says all bets are off.

"I pretty much knew what to expect pre-Katrina, but the hurricane has changed the dynamics of everything," Gernon said. "From a marketing point of view there are complex dynamics and I am not presumptuous to say I can ever learn them."

What Gernon does know is that the new homeowners in the two fresh subdivisions near the Shady Pond will all have to drive past his Shady Pond signage at La. 41 and Pine Street Extension. And that may boost sales.

It may also increase his property value.

"The subdivision development adds to the dynamics and makes Shady Pond more unique," Gernon said. "Shady Pond stands out and will continue to do so for the foreseeable future. It becomes more and more special."

Gernon expects to sell about the same amount of Christmas trees this year as he always does. Dubbed the "king of all Christmas tree media" by the Market Bulletin, he will soon be cranking up his public relations machine to generate publicity for the Shady Pond.

"The Market Bulletin helped to incubate our publicity last year," Gernon said. "And Johnny Morgan of the LSU AgCenter helped in that too."

"I have focused on my standing trees. I'll go through the year and see what the outcome is. We've got an adequate supply of trees and it could be bad or good."

It remains to be seen if Gernon's glass of champagne for his New Year's toast will be half full or half empty.

between the Mississippi River and the marsh protection levees destroyed the grass and ruined the water supply so Armstrong trucked his cattle to Alabama for safekeeping. He finally brought his decimated herd back to Louisiana in early August.

Cattle farming is a way of life for Armstrong and he refuses to quit, but it will take him some time to build up his cattle again.

"I lost cattle up here (Point Celeste) too, but they're a different type of cattle compared to what I had down the river," Armstrong said. "You can't get cattle like I had down there. You raise them in the marsh. They had their calves in the marsh. Those cattle always did well for 37 years."

"If I were to buy a group of cattle from somewhere else and put them down there, I'd probably lose half of them the first year."

Other cattlemen, like Billy Nungesser of Point Celeste, quickly sold the remnants of their herds.

Nungesser said he wants to bring cattle back to his land, but will wait until the old levee protecting the fragile strip of dry land between La. 23 and the marsh is improved.

"I sold mine because I knew it would cost money to keep them somewhere else and transport them back," Nungesser said. "I didn't want to bring any cattle back until we get this levee completely fixed. The back levee is still in deplorable shape."

He pointed to a recently repaired breach. The barren brown dirt of the mend looks like a scab healing on the otherwise green levee.

"They're talking about 18 months before they even get started with the levee," Nungesser said. "If a category one hits Lafayette, water is coming over the levee. The question is will we be able to pump it out to keep the land dry?"

At the same time, Nungesser is forced to keep his herd of mountain elk in Plaquemines Parish because he has no where else to put them.

Nungesser said other cattlemen have brought their surviving cattle back to Plaquemines Parish, but they are not investing in new cows.

It's a wait-and-see game, Nungesser said. "I've been keeping my eye on buying some more cattle but it looks like the best deal is to wait until this levee is fixed," he said.

In the meantime, recent rains have greened the coastal pastures and a few cattlemen have returned their surviving cows back to the land. The giant back levee water pumps at Point Celeste owned by Citrus Land Company have been repaired and new power poles installed adjacent to the lines bent by Katrina. Even with the progress, rebuilding efforts in lower Plaquemines crawl at a snail's pace.

"There is so much to do," said Nungesser.

Under water for weeks after Hurricane Katrina, repairs to Billy Nungesser's Point Celeste Therapeutic Riding Center are beginning a year after the storm. Nungesser hopes the arena, a horseback riding facility for disabled children, will be operational in September.

Louisiana Agriculture & Forestry Today

Odom signs agreement to sell syrup mill

Commissioner of Agriculture and Forestry Bob Odom, on behalf of the Louisiana Agricultural Finance Authority, and Cementos Andino S.A. have signed an agreement that sells 80 percent of the Lacassine syrup mill to the company and requires construction of a $50 million ethanol plant next to the mill.

"This is a great day for the people of Louisiana. The ethanol plant will bring additional income to farmers, jobs will be created and in the future fuel prices could go down as we become less dependent on foreign oil," Odom said. "Cementos Andino is a reputable company and they are going to be a positive force in the business community of southwest Louisiana."

The agreement calls for farmers in the Lake Charles Cane Cooperative to remain owners of 20 percent of the syrup mill. They will also own 20 percent of the ethanol plant.

"I have said all along that I want Louisiana farmers to have a role in the development of the state's ethanol industry. This deal helps solidify the role farmers will play in emerging agriculture industries," Odom said.

Cementos Andino is a cement company based in Colombia. The family that owns Cementos recently sold the company's cement interests to focus on ethanol.

Daniel Pelaez, president of Cementos Andino, said, "We are an industrial conglomerate with vast experience in many different activities, including the building materials industry, the agro-technical and agricultural business among some others. For this particular project in Lacassine we have gathered together a group of technicians, some of them with more than three decades of experience in the sugar industry. Our team has also been the leader in the installation of some ethanol plants in Colombia which today are producing more than 1 million liters per day of ethanol. The decision of investing in Louisiana is a great step toward the internationalization of our group. We are very proud of having the opportunity of doing business in the United States and we are very optimistic about making a great team with the farmers from Louisiana."

The Colombian company decided to focus on ethanol both in North and South America and it is currently working on some other projects for the production of ethanol from sugarcane. The funds coming from the sale of the company's cement and ready mix assets will mostly be invested in the ethanol and agricultural business as a clear bet on the future of "green energy."

The company is paying a $300,000 deposit and has 15 days from the signing of the agreement to begin acquiring the environmental permits needed for construction of the ethanol plant.

The Lacassine syrup mill was financed by the state for $45 million. Cementos Andino and the Lake Charles Cane Cooperative are buying the mill for $60 million. The mill will make sugarcane syrup from cane grown in southwest Louisiana. The syrup will be used to produce ethanol on site or will be transported to mills in southeast Louisiana for processing into raw sugar. The syrup mill reduces the number of cane trucks on roads and highways by making its product transportable by train.

A note from Commissioner Odom

Dear Readers,

As we mark the passing of the one-year anniversary of Hurricane Katrina and prepare for the one-year anniversary of Hurricane Rita, the tragic events of those days are still fresh in our memories.

It's important for us to remember these hurricanes affected our entire state, not just the southeastern and southwestern parishes. Many farmers across Louisiana lost an important market for their goods in New Orleans; others were left in a lurch when the Mississippi River was closed to barge traffic and grain elevators weren't operating. Timber markets were overloaded by massive amounts of downed trees cleared from land and roadways. Producers also volunteered to help with livestock recovery and feeding operations.

In the end, the farming and forestry communities suffered more than $2 billion in economic losses though the personal losses were even more substantial. As we begin year two of the rebuilding and revitalization of our state and industry, I urge you to recall the poignant moments of last year and let them be your inspiration for continuing to make Louisiana a better place. There is still a lot to be done and with everyone working together it can be achieved.

Sincerely,

Bob Odom

Evening telecasts of a struggling New Orleans disturbed him.

"We watched on TV and saw all the stuff that was happening down in New Orleans. That's what we were worried about. We're up here, planting not even a month after the storm had passed, and we're wondering who in New Orleans is going to buy strawberries.

"We wholesale a lot in New Orleans. We see all this stuff. They don't have electricity in New Orleans and we're planting berries on Sept. 28."

Morrow grinned broadly, as if the simple action of planting strawberries was the work of a madman. He revealed he had no choice but to plant; the strawberry starters were pre-paid.

"So we planted and people bought them and it was a great year!" Morrow exclaimed. "They bought them in New Orleans. They bought them in Baton Rouge."

Hurricane Katrina forced Morrow to change his business plan.

He's still planting a fall vegetable crop, but it's geared to the farmers market, not for wholesaling in New Orleans.

"We downsized since the storm," Morrow said. "We're really just small scale farmers on anything except strawberries."

He has also decided to add blueberries to his mix.

"Blueberries are a little diversification," Morrow said. "We want something for May and June when we still have our workers here."

Morrow calculated his losses at somewhere between $30,000 and $50,000.

In addition to the crop loss, Morrow lost a 100-year old barn, but he and his cousin, William Fletcher, a neighboring strawberry farmer, milled the hundreds of fallen pine trees into lumber and built a new one.

Morrow didn't speculate on what the future might bring for his farm.

"I'm just staying where I'm at," Morrow said. "We expanded a little bit, but we're just centralized in Baton Rouge. We minimized our fall risks. After October, we're going to have berries. That will keep us busy all summer."

"All in all, life is back to normal. I never want to see a hurricane like Katrina again. It all worked out. I'm back to farming, but I've had that experience and I don't want to see another one ever again."

trees," Vogel said. "All we did this year was replace the trees we lost. We didn't add any acreage."

To maximize production, low hanging branches laden with green nuts will not be cropped this year.

"I normally cut them off, because they get in the way of the equipment," Vogel said. "But they've got a few nuts, so to get as many nuts as we can to harvest, we're not doing anything to them this year."

Vogel estimated his trees will produce a 60 percent crop this fall. And he is relieved.

"We were really afraid with all the wind damage, the limb damage and the defoliation, the pecan trees would take all of their energy to produce new growth and not produce pecans," Vogel said. "I don't know if it's our fertilization, but we did get a decent crop for this year."

It's still early in the hurricane season, but Vogel is pleased with his orchard's recovery.

"The trees look real good," Vogel said. "The leaves look healthy. The light green leaves are all new growth. When you see light green that means the trees are growing and they're not under stress."

Eric Morrow

Picking up the pieces in Ponchatoula

It's early August and an angry thunderhead is moving in from the south over the Ponchatoula strawberry fields, but the dark clouds don't disturb Eric Morrow's sunny disposition.

And even after Hurricane Katrina ruined his 10,000 fall tomato plants and 5,000 eggplants last Aug. 29, the Tangipahoa truck farmer is in a word, happy.

"We were fortunate. Very fortunate we didn't end up like the people down in New Orleans," Morrow said. "I got my life, my health, my wife, the house."

He paused for just a moment, as if calculating a mental cipher. Finally he declared, "We're all right."

Morrow wears the life of a simple country truck farmer quite well, but don't let his good old boy demeanor fool you. The former Chicago commodities trader is sharp as a tack and one thing he knows is his Louisiana berry market. But even an experienced farmer like Morrow didn't know how Hurricane Katrina was going to affect his sales of spring strawberries.

The storm rolled in last August and destroyed every single one of his fall tomatoes and eggplants.

"Katrina tore everything up," Morrow said. "The tomatoes were in the green stage, but the wind tore all of the leaves off the plants and tore the eggplants the same way."

And that was it. An entire fall crop destroyed in one day.

Used to working on a cash basis, Morrow had to dig deeply into his savings to prepare for spring strawberries.

"We went in the hole," Morrow said. "We lost all the money on planting and then instead of working in the fields, we had to spend more on clean up."

Trees from adjacent woodlands blew into Morrow's strawberry fields, ripping yards of the expensive black sheeting used to protect strawberry plants.

Less than a month after Katrina and dozens of burn piles later, Morrow had enough of his fields cleared of debris to start planting strawberries, his bread and butter crop.

He wasn't as concerned for his lost tomatoes and eggplants as he was for his spring strawberry crop.

"Sometimes you work for nothing. You spend all this money and you prep it all out. But all of this other stuff didn't mean anything," Morrow said. "Fall tomatoes are lagniappe. If it works, it's great. If it doesn't, it's bad, but it's not the end of the world."

Pecan grower feels effects twice

Tom and Judy Vogel of Plantation Pride Louisiana Pecans know 2006 will be an off-production year for their 60-acre Grant Parish pecan orchard.

Tom Vogel explained that pecan trees across the country have "on" years, when the tree will produce an overabundance of nuts, but the bountiful harvest is always followed by a season of lesser production.

"It's a phenomenon scientists can't explain," Vogel said.

2005 was an "on" year for pecan trees until the worst hurricane season in recent memory ravaged Louisiana from border to border.

Vogel and other northwestern Louisiana pecan growers dodged a bullet when Hurricane Katrina's winds and rain hit the Louisiana-Mississippi coast last Aug. 29. Four weeks later, Hurricane Rita, Katrina's evil stepsister, blew half of Vogel's green pecan crop to the ground days before final ripening. Many farmers outside of areas affected by Katrina realized later they were dealt a double whammy when Rita's winds came blowing in – destruction from the second storm and loss of markets from the first.

"Last year was a disaster," Vogel said.

He doesn't have to look far for reminders of Rita. At the entrance to his orchard running along the old Bayou LaBorne, a large Elliot pecan tree felled by hurricane winds is nearly overcome with underbrush.

"It's not in my way," Vogel said. "Out of sight, out of mind."

Vogel devotes his entire nut crop to his Plantation Pride Louisiana Pecans retail outlet, which markets pecans across the nation.

"We grow all of our nuts for our retail business," Vogel said. "But we had very few nuts for the business. We had to buy $10,000 worth of nuts from other sources just to keep our customers happy.

"Despite everything, we had a good year. A lot of New Orleans people moved up here as displaced people."

The additional purchased nuts satisfied demand and Plantation Pride turned a profit last holiday season, but Vogel was saddled with cleanup costs and other losses that lessened his earnings.

Vogel's $100-per-acre orchard clearing costs were deemed ineligible for FEMA reimbursement, and he lamented the loss of the early nut crop he depends so heavily upon to keep his plantation in the black.

"We have a lot of the Kiowa variety," Vogel said. "It's an early nut. We start harvesting those at the first of October.

"In the retail business, we try to hit that early market. That's where the money is."

One unresolved marketing issue, brought on by Hurricane Katrina not Rita, is that of the Plantation Pride mailing list. With more than 1,800 repeat customers from New Orleans zip codes gone, that could cut into all-important proceeds.

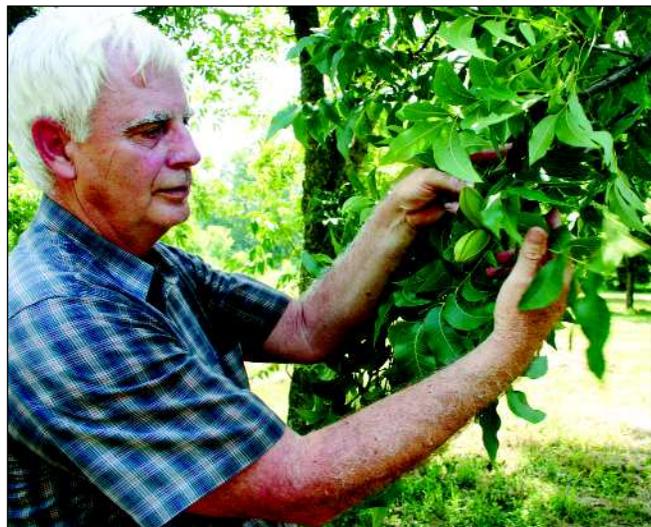

"We couldn't mail bulk to New Orleans because the post office wouldn't deliver it," Vogel said. "You could mail first class, but if it came back, it was just wasted money."

"We contacted those that we could personally, but those we couldn't reach we had to let go."

For this year, Vogel plans on buying current New Orleans mailing lists and comparing them to his own database.

Rita also temporarily put a halt to Vogel's annual grove expansion plans.

"We normally would plant 10 acres a year of new See Vogel, continued on page 10

Tom Vogel will harvest every pecan, even those on low-hanging branches, because this year's harvest will be an "off year." Normally, low-hanging branches are removed because they get in the way of harvesting equipment.

Eric Morrow's barn collapsed under Hurricane Katrina's brutal winds last August. Morrow saw it as an opportunity to build a new barn using wood he milled from fallen trees on his family's property (see picture on page 10).
